

How do we practically ensure that a steel to be used for structural applications provides sufficient ductility?

Or in other words:

What could properties from run-of-the mill testing such as:

Suggest about a material's performance in structural-level ductility considerations such as:

